Dating Matters Capacity Assessment: Local Health Departments Survey

The purpose of the Dating Matters Capacity Assessment Tool is to guide you in gathering information about your local health department's strengths and areas for improvement. The information obtained from this tool will be used to help you and your technical assistance provider devise an action plan for capacity building. The Dating Matters Capacity Assessment Tool covers information on a wide range of capacity dimensions that are related to effective program implementation. The questions address strengths and skills relevant to preventing teen dating violence and promoting healthy relationships for young people.

Please feel free to seek out information from other staff and partners as you complete this survey. The responses will be combined across respondents. You will receive an assessment report and action plan geared toward your organization's specific needs. The scores are generally averages or totals of items reflecting important capacity/readiness areas. The scores will be graphed to show where your agency ranks on a range from high to low. The purpose is to provide your organization with information for team building and capacity building for implementation of evidence-based programming. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) expects that all grantees will have capacity areas that need improvement.

This information will not be used to rate grantees on implementation. It is simply a tool to help your organization reach its highest potential for implementing the Dating Matters initiative.

The assessment report and action plan will be provided to you via e-mail. You may share it with the key staff, stakeholders, and partners you deem relevant. A copy of your assessment report and action plan will also be submitted to your CDC task monitor and your technical assistance provider. We appreciate your honest reflection in responding to these questions.
