S 4. STUDY DESCRIPTION: The Fond du Lac Community Biomonitoring Study will focus on chemicals found in the area near Lake Superior and northern Minnesota. People may come into contact with these chemicals through normal day-to-day activities, like working or eating fish or other wildlife. pause

By testing blood and urine in people, this study will find out which environmental chemicals are getting into people. Other general measures of health, such as blood pressure, height, and weight, will also be taken to give information on diabetes and heart health to people who participate. pause

To take part, people need to be medically able and willing to give a sample of blood and urine to test for environmental chemicals. These samples will not be used for genetic testing or tested for drug or alcohol use. Everyone who decides to be in the study will receive their personal results. People will also be asked some questions about fish and other foods they eat, jobs, and where they have lived. pause

The results from this study will help people learn more about how foods and activities are related to environmental chemicals in people. Personal results may help people to protect their health. The study will pay for all of the tests. People will be given gift cards for taking part in the study.

It is up to you alone whether you take part or not. Your choice will not affect any services you get from, or your relationships with, Fond du Lac, the Minnesota Department of Health or the federal government. You would also be free to quit at any time.
