About the Survey

The survey covers all public school systems that provide elementary or secondary education. The data include revenue by source (local property tax, monies from other school systems, private tuition and transportation payments, school lunch charges, direct state aid, and federal aid passed through the state government), expenditure by function and object (instruction, support service functions, salaries, and capital outlay), indebtedness, and cash and investments.

The U.S. Congress (including the Congressional Research Service staff), and other federal agencies including the National Center for Education Statistics, the Bureau of Economic Analysis, the Department of Education (including the special education and impact aid offices), the Department of Defense, and the Department of Interior (including the Bureau of Indian Affairs) routinely use the data for program and policy analyses. State and local governments use the information for intra- and interstate peer analysis. Universities and professional associations use the data for trend and equity analyses. In addition to numerous academic researchers who use the data products, staff receive inquiries from state government officials, legislatures, public policy analysts, local school officials, non-profit organizations, and various Federal agencies.
