National Science Foundation Website Redesign Usability Testing

PURPOSE:

Viderity, Inc. intends to perform usability testing for the redesign of the National Science Foundation website (NSF.gov). To do this, we will need to engage volunteers from the general public in three different testing exercises:

- Card Sorts to determine the optimal organization and hierarchy of public content on the website.
- Tree Tests to ensure that navigation menu presents the core information logically and intuitively.
- Wireframe Tests to ensure that prototype pages are easy to use, and that critical information can be located quickly and easily.

These tests will be conducted in stages throughout the Spring and Summer of 2019. Each test will take approximately 5-7 working days to complete.

DESCRIPTION OF RESPONDENTS:

Respondents will be members of the general public not affiliated with the National Science Foundation. They should be at least 18 years of age and have either a professional/educational background in STEM subjects or an interest in scientific disciplines.
