TITLE OF INFORMATION COLLECTION:

National Responsible Fatherhood Clearinghouse (NRFH) Deliverable entitled “Examining the relationships between living in a violent environment and its impact on children and the method of parenting.”

PURPOSE:

The purpose of these focus groups (listed here as Fatherhood Conversations) is to examine the relationship of how living in a violent environment impact a father’s method of parenting, specifically for fathers whose children show signs of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD).

Research indicates that children exposed to multiple forms of violence are at more risk of developing psychological symptoms. Most urban children, by the time they enter high school, have seen the use of weapons, guns or other acts of violence against people in their neighborhood, school or home. In communities with high rates of violence, many families experience chronic stress and anxiety, particularly the children. Exposure to community violence is particularly prevalent in poor inner-city neighborhoods. Children in these neighborhoods are at increased risk of exposure to community violence as compared to children residing in less economically distressed suburban areas.

Aside from community violence, violence in the home has adverse impacts on children.¹ According to the UNICEF report “Behind Closed Doors”, infants and small children who are exposed to violence in the home experience, so much added emotional stress that it can harm the development of their brains and impair cognitive and sensory growth. As they grow, these children may continue to show signs of behavioral, emotional, psychological and developmental challenges. Primary-school-aged children may have more trouble with schoolwork, demonstrate aggressive behavior and show poor concentration and focus.

To help advance the understanding among Fatherhood stakeholders of how fathers parent in communities with high rates of violence and its impact on the children, we propose conducting two Fatherhood Conversations with fathers living in communities with high rates of violence to gather information to answer the following key questions:

- How does community violence affect children and parenting among both custodial and non-custodial fathers?
- How does domestic violence affect children and parenting among custodial and non-custodial fathers?

Findings from these Fatherhood Conversations will help inform the following products:

- Webinar: The purpose of the Webinar is to share the findings from the fatherhood focus groups as well as engage in a discussion for policy and programmatic recommendations with respect and to provide guidance to responsible fatherhood practice and policy leaders. The target population for the Webinar includes fatherhood practitioners, researchers, and policy makers.
- Report: The purpose of the summary report is to produce a written document/resource that shares the findings from the fatherhood focus groups as well provide guidance to
