ILA's current membership consists primarily of lead producers and other companies having a direct interest in lead and its use. ILA is a non-profit, tax-exempt research organization whose functions include the management of research to improve existing uses and advance new applications for lead. The CBI program has been established by ILA to carry out research and development of lead-based battery technologies. The CBI participants include companies who are not members of ILA.

The general area of CBI's planned activity is to serve the needs of its members by supporting cutting edge pre-competitive scientific research and promoting innovation in lead battery technology to maximize the market potential for lead batteries and the prosperity of actors in the lead battery value chain. CBI's vision is to be recognized by all stakeholders as the trusted global center for collaborative, pre-competitive lead battery research and authoritative voice on lead battery innovation by taking a leadership role in supporting lead battery research investment and the promotion of innovation. Membership in the Consortium includes lead producers; battery manufacturers; battery equipment, material and component manufacturers/suppliers; commodity traders; end users; research, testing and other services; universities; and affiliates. Consortium membership remains open, and the parties intend to file additional written notification disclosing all changes in membership to CBI.
