YRBS YOUTH RISK BEHAVIOR SURVEY

BACKGROUND

The National Youth Tobacco Survey (NYTS) is a nationally representative survey of middle and high school students that focuses exclusively on tobacco use patterns and associated factors. Information collection employs a repeat cross-sectional design to develop national estimates of tobacco use and its correlates, including exposure to pro- and anti-tobacco influences among youth. NYTS data are principally used to generate prevalence and associated factors of tobacco use patterns and correlates that inform public health programs and activities.

The NYTS is a paper and pencil questionnaire administered to U.S. middle and high school students, grades 6-12. A probability based, nationally representative sample is used to select schools. Within selected schools, classes are randomly selected and all students in the selected class are eligible to participate. In order to minimize the burden on the schools and students, the NYTS is completed in one class period. NYTS provides comprehensive data about the use and correlates of tobacco products such as bidis, cigarettes, cigars, tobacco pipes, smokeless tobacco, snus, dissolvable tobacco products, hookahs, and electronic cigarettes; exposure to secondhand smoke; smoking cessation; school curriculum; minors' ability to purchase or obtain tobacco products; and, knowledge and attitudes about tobacco and familiarity with pro-tobacco and anti-tobacco media messages.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's (CDC) Office on Smoking and Health (OSH) conducted an external peer review of the sampling frame and survey design methodology used to administer the NYTS to assess whether there is a more efficient and effective approach for improving coverage rates and increasing participation rates among U.S. middle and high schools. The external review of the NYTS was conducted in October 2016 by a workgroup composed of four peer subject matter experts (SME) on survey methodology whose primary focus is public health research, representing a combination of researchers and academicians. Each SME provided independent feedback and recommendations on the NYTS methodology.

EXTERNAL PEER REVIEW PROCESS

The peer review was conducted by a workgroup composed of four subject matter experts (SME) on survey methodology, external to CDC. Facilitation and logistical assistance was provided by a CDC OSH contractor.

Workgroup Peer Reviewers:

J. Michael Bowling, PhD Research Associate Professor Department of Health Behavior University of North Carolina Gillings School of Global Public Health Timothy Johnson, PhD Director, UIC Survey Research Laboratory Professor of Public Administration University of Illinois-Chicago

The review assessed the opportunities for improvement in the survey sampling methodology. Specific objectives of the review included:

Delineating the strengths, weaknesses and opportunities for improvement in the current methodology used to administer the NYTS, addressing the following four areas:

- a. Sampling frame construction: To assess the current way of constructing a sampling frame and potential improvements in order to construct a valid and reliable sampling frame that accurately provides a comprehensive, up-to-date list that covers U.S. middle and high schools and could be used to draw representative samples of U.S. middle and high schools.
- b. Sampling design: To determine enhancements to the current sampling methods in order to get a valid representative sample of U.S. middle and high school students.
- c. Recruitment: To investigate potential ways to improve participation and response rates, especially among minority populations.
- d. Weighting: To solicit feedback on current weighting procedures for NYTS.

Each member assessed the strengths and weaknesses of the current NYTS sampling frame and methodology, as well as provided individual recommendations in four areas of survey methodology, including sampling frame construction, sampling design, recruitment and post hoc sample weighting.

Prior to the actual in-person review meeting a web-conference was convened with members of the workgroup to provide an overview on the management and administration of the NYTS. External reviewers were invited to submit written individual questions and comments during and post the web-conference to assist CDC in providing the workgroup with the necessary materials and information in advance of the in-person review meeting.

The in-person review was conducted in one day and facilitated by an independent third party contractor (Agenda is provided in Appendix A). CDC and the NYTS survey contractor conducted in-depth presentations about the various components of managing and administering the NYTS, including school recruitment methods. A discussion period was convened to answer reviewer questions. Each reviewer deliberated to formulate findings and draft recommendations. The findings and recommendations from each reviewer was collated into a final report by the CDC OSH contractor. The recommendations were classified under four domains, sampling frame, sampling design, recruitment and weighting methodology.

The program responses and rationale to each of the recommendations are presented in this report.

OSH (the program) responses to the recommendations are categorized as follows:

Concur and change in effect – agree and have the funding, staff, and control over the means to begin implementation of the recommendation; rationale is provided.

Concur and change planned for future – agree and plan to implement based on the funding or staff resources; rationale is provided.

Concur in principle but change cannot be made – do not have the funding or staff resources, or the recommendation is not currently feasible for the NYTS, or program does not have control over the means to begin implementing the recommendation; rationale is provided.

Do not concur and change not made – rationale for non-concurrence is provided.

The following is a brief summary of comments on NYTS strengths from the external peer reviewers (Detail comments on NYTS strengths are provided in the Table below).

- The sample frame for NYTS is clear and well defined, and likely provides coverage of a very high proportion of all age eligible adolescents in the United States.
- The NYTS sample design is clearly outlined and provides a reliable and representative sample of schools and students that is stratified by several variables with important policy ramifications, including urban vs. rural status, and level of minority concentrations of the schools.
- The NYTS recruitment procedures are appropriate with response rates comparable to other school-based national samples. The school and parental recruitment processes appear to be executed in a highly professional and systematic manner.
- The sample weighting, nonresponse adjustment and calibration using an iterative rake-trim method are particular strengths of the NYTS survey design. The NYTS follows standard statistical weighting best practices and procedures such as the provision of base weights, adjustments for nonresponse, and the application of additional adjustments, such as trimming.

	SAMPLING FRAME	SAMPLING DESIGN	RECRUITMENT	WEIGHTING
STRENGTHS	The sample frame for NYTS is clear and well defined, and likely provides coverage of a very high proportion of all age eligible adolescents in the United States. Using National Center for Education Statistics (NCES) Common Core of Data (CCD) as the sampling frame for public schools is a best practice and should be continued. The CCD is the best source of upto-date information about public schools, their grade spans and enrollment, and district affiliation, and CCD are provided on a consistent basis (updated annually) within and across states. Using NCES' Private School Universe Survey (PSS) as the sampling frame for private schools is a best practice and should be continued. Continue to augment currently used databases with other existing available commercial frames (i.e., Market Data Retrieval, Inc.) but realize that private sector lists may be derived from the CCD.	The sample design is clearly outlined and provides a reliable and representative sample of schools and students that is stratified by several variables with important policy ramifications, including urban vs. rural status, and level of minority concentrations of the schools. The choice of Primary Sampling Unit or PSU, (county, groups of small counties, or part of a large county) is an appropriate measure of clustering to gain logistical efficiencies. Schools are the Secondary Sampling Unit (SSU). The sample design restricts the number of schools selected per PSU to a small number which minimizes the size of design effect (DEFF) due to clustering. Using PSU as the first stage reduces travel costs for field staff and makes the design more efficient. The NAEP program has determined that, for national data collections, it is cost efficient to use a PSU-based design — although this cost efficiency may not hold true if the NYTS decides to collect state-level samples in addition to national level samples. Using PSU-based samples also provides an effective means of controlling the extent to which individual schools () are included in successive assessments. Continue as a best practice to release the sample of selected schools in May prior to the school year when data collection takes place. This allows for selected schools to put the data collection on their school calendar before the prior year is over.	NYTS and contracting staff responsible for this work are to be commended for the efforts they are able to coordinate and the levels of success that they achieve. Recruitment procedures are appropriate with response rates comparable to other school-based national samples. There are no indications that survey data are biased by school-level nonresponse and little potential for bias in student response rates due to school level or racial composition. The school and parental recruitment processes appear to be executed in a highly professional and systematic manner. These are not easy and are clearly the most time-consuming aspects of the annual NYTS process. At the school level, personal outreach and recruitment by highly skilled and informed staff are necessary for success. The high proportion of participating schools that permit passive parental consent is also important to acknowledge as an important NYTS accomplishment as this likely leads to higher overall cooperation rates for the survey.	Sample weighting, nonresponse adjustment and calibration using an iterative rake-trim method are particular strengths of the NYTS survey design. Analytical methods are appropriate for the sample design. Design effects are reasonable given clustering at the county and school level. Given the small number of schools selected at the PSU level, it is not likely that DEFFs can be diminished significantly through modifications in the design. The NYTS follows standard statistical weighting best practices and procedures such as the provision of base weights, adjustments for nonresponse, and the application of additional adjustments, such as trimming.

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR THE NATIONAL YOUTH TOBACCO SURVEY

I. SAMPLING FRAME

1. Using National Center for Education Statistics' (NCES) Common Core Dataset (CCD) and Private School Survey dataset (PSS) files as the school sampling frames allows for NYTS results to be reported consistently with other NCES statistics based on CCD data. This overlap between NYTS and NCES surveys should be explored more fully for both public and private schools reporting.

Program response: Concur and change in effect

The present NYTS sampling frame construction combines different data sources. The first source is a file produced by Market Data Retrieval, Inc. (MDR) which contains school enrollments, grades, and racial/ethnic distributions for public and private schools across the nation, data that are all used in the sampling design. In addition, the frame contains district and county information, and other contact information. The other data source consists of two files from the National Center for Education Statistics; the CCD which is a national file of public schools, and the PSS, a file of national non-public schools. Over time, we have moved from a frame constructed singly from the MDR files to a frame that also incorporates data from the two NCES data sources—CCD and PSS to increase the coverage of both public and private schools for a nationally representative sample.

After considerable testing and simulations, this multiple-source frame was first implemented for the 2014 NYTS. Including schools sourced from the two NCES files in addition to the MDR file resulted in a coverage increase among all public and non-public high schools of 23%. There was a 15.5% increase of coverage among public schools and a 46% increase in coverage among private high schools. The increase of schools increased the student coverage among public high schools by 2% and 16.5% for private high schools. Most of the added schools were smaller schools. The findings clearly demonstrated the gains in using multiple data sources.

2. The NYTS should invest in identifying ways to potentially improve the measure of size (MOS) information that is employed as part of the sampling process.

Program response: Concur and change in effect

The need for oversampling Hispanic students has been gradually reduced with the increasing numbers of Hispanics among the student population. Some degree of oversampling non-Hispanic black students remains in the sampling design.

The MOS was previously used to increase the probability of selection of high racial/ethnic minority PSUs and schools using a Probability Proportional to Size (PPS) sampling design. The effectiveness of a weighted MOS in achieving oversampling is dependent upon the distributions of non-Hispanic black and Hispanic students in schools. The need for a weighted MOS is predicated on a relatively low prevalence of minority students in the population; however, this premise has become less tenable with the increase of nonwhite students in the population overall, and specifically, Hispanic students.

To facilitate accurate prevalence estimates among racial/ethnic minority groups, prior cycles of the NYTS have employed multiple strategies to increase the number of non-Hispanic black and Hispanic students included in the sample. These approaches have included over-sampling PSUs in high racial/ethnic minority strata, the use of a weighted MOS, and double class selection in large schools that contained a sufficient proportion of minority students. This method has been shown to reduce design effects for survey estimates, which is defined as the variance of actual survey estimates divided by the variance of a simple random sample of the same size.

3. Improve timeliness of the school frame through collaboration with other school survey organizations, which is likely the most budget neutral improvement that can be made to the current design. Incorporating the National Driver Register (NDR) could be considered for improved timeliness.

Program response: Concur in Principle but change cannot be made

If timeliness of the school frame refers to whether or not the frame has the most up-to-date information, the annual updates made to the MDR frame confirm that all updates to the MDR file are made prior to each cycle's sample draw. The MDR data file is updated annually to ensure district and school information is accurate. Calls are made by MDR to school districts in the late summer to early fall followed by calls to schools which conclude by early January. This update process includes identifying new schools, deleting schools that have closed, and reconfirming other data points collected as part of the file (enrollments, racial/ethnic composition, contact information, etc.). These frames are updated in the fall and spring each year.

OSH is not opposed to drawing on the resources of other school survey organizations and possibly researching the value-add of incorporating information from other sources; however, the NDR only identifies a very small subset (high school students who have a driver's license) of the NYTS population. Also, since NYTS sample is drawn by institution (schools) as opposed to students, incorporating the NDR data source would not be appropriate for the NYTS sampling.

4. In addition to other commercial frames, the NYTS should make use of state, school, and district websites to check on the quality of the school file. To compensate for the fact that NCES' CCD file (used to create the public school sampling frame) could be two to three years out of date, at the time of NYTS frame creation the program should consider implementing a "new schools procedure" that could supplement the NYTS samples. NCES' National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP) program successfully creates limited frames of new public schools every two years whereby new schools are included in the sample along with the original school sample. In addition to being a good quality check of the CCD file, it also allows for schools that may not be covered adequately on CCD (such as charter schools) to become eligible to be sampled.

Program response: Concur in Principle but change cannot be made

OSH does not have the capacity to check the entire public/private school frame data files against their respective state, district and school websites during the frame construction and prior to sampling. Mining the entire public/private school frame data is a very resource intensive approach. However, the current methodology does include a validation of all sample information once the sample is drawn. The validation is conducted via phone with the states, districts and schools as well as supplemental checks on websites. We use websites to obtain information if no one can be reached by phone. We have found that the websites can be out of date and that phone calls provide much more accurate and up-to-date information.

OSH has made several efforts to ensure that our sampling frame is current, complete, and correct. For example, OSH uses multiple sources of information to construct the NYTS sampling frame, including (1) MDR which contains school enrollments, grades, and racial/ethnic distributions for public and private schools across the nation; (2) NCES' the CCD which is a national file of public schools, and (3) the PSS dataset. OSH is confident that with these multiple sources, the probability of non-coverage of a given school is very low.

Finally, OSH realizes the importance of inclusion of new schools in the sample along with the original school sample; however, potential for non-coverage error arising from newly introduced schools not being captured in the existing NYTS sampling frame is likely to be small. Data from the NCES shows that the total number of public schools in the US has remained stable between 98,000 and 99,000 in the past decade; indicating an equilibrium between the number of closed schools and number of newly opened schools. Most of the schools with high turnover rates are outside the universe of NYTS. For example, examination of NCES data for the 1,737 schools that were closed in 2013-2014 showed that most were not part of NYTS universe including: elementary; special education; vocational; and alternative schools, among others.

II. SAMPLING DESIGN

1. Including additional school types in the sampling frame was suggested which would expand the scope of the current design; however, a thorough examination of students omitted should be conducted before deciding on the approach.

Program response: Concur in Principle but change cannot be made

While adding additional school types in the sampling frame would expand the scope of the current NYTS design, the NYTS sample design excludes Department of Defense (DOD), Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) and Juvenile Justice Center (JJC) schools for a variety of reasons. The DOD and BIA schools are excluded because these schools fall under a separate jurisdiction offering many barriers to recruitment and data collection (e.g. not supported by State Departments of Education and Health), and they cover a relatively small share of the eligible student population. The DOD schools present the additional challenge in that many are overseas and cost-prohibitive to travel to for so little added representation. In addition, the BIA schools have added research restrictions including, for example, sponsorship by local tribes to survey schools located on reservation territory. The JJCs are excluded for multiple reasons including the transient nature of their population, the lack of denominator data for sampling frame purposes, and the fact that many of the students also have a "relationship" of some kind with a regular public school that is their home school.

2. DOD schools should be explored to be included in the NYTS as a single reporting entity. Every two years, the NAEP program successfully collects data on-site (both domestic and international) from Department of Defense Education Activity (DODEA) schools and reports on DODEA schools.

Program response: Concur in Principle but change cannot be made

The DOD schools are excluded because these schools fall under a separate jurisdiction offering many barriers to recruitment and data collection (e.g. not supported by State Departments of Education and Health), and they cover a relatively small share of the eligible student population. These schools present an added issue that many are overseas and cost prohibitive to travel to for so little added representation.

3. Given adolescent developmental trajectories associated with the take-up of tobacco use behaviors, it is conceivable that the tobacco use rates in any given school could be very different at some grade levels between the start and the conclusion of the Spring Semester. This is a potential concern that could be at least partially addressed via analyses of existing NYTS data that compares tobacco use prevalence, while introducing appropriate controls, based on the date that questionnaires are administered to students. Indeed, such analyses could be conducted with NYTS data pooled across multiple years, which might ensure adequate statistical power was available.

Program response: Concur and change planned for future

It is understood that tobacco use prevalence in a given school could be different at some grade levels between the start and the conclusion of the spring semester (the season of NYTS survey administration). As recommended, this could be at least partially addressed via analyses of existing NYTS data that compares tobacco use prevalence, while introducing appropriate controls, based on the date that questionnaires are administered to students.

4. Consider using substitute schools when the originally sampled school is not able to participate, but has students who should validly be included in the NYTS. Substitute schools can provide an effective means of reducing the bias due to school nonresponse, provided that each substitute school is quite closely matched to the school it's replacing with regard to characteristics that are related to the original school's selection.

Program response: Concur and change planned for future

OSH will explore the use of substitute schools in our next cycle of sampling, which is targeted for 2018. Most of the survey methods for dealing with nonresponse have focused on post-data collection adjustments such as weighting, imputation, and statistical modeling. Although post-survey adjustments are flexible and relatively inexpensive methods for dealing with missing data, survey data collection presents unique opportunities to minimize nonresponse error. As Benjamin King once said, "There is only one real cure for nonresponse and that is getting the response" (Frankel and King, 1996). In practice, however, with finite resources and time, nonresponse cannot be eliminated entirely. But some actions and interventions during the data collection stage could potentially mitigate the impact of nonresponse on final estimates.

Frankel, M. and King, B. (1996). A conversation with Leslie Kish. Statistical Science, Vol. 11, No. 1, pp. 65-87

5. Consider oversampling American Indian/Alaskan Native (AI/AN) students to allow for subgroup reporting for these students. Two potential approaches include: 1) including BIE students in the sample; and 2) oversampling high proportion American Indian schools in certain select states (i.e., Arizona, Minnesota, North Carolina, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wisconsin).

Program response: Concur and change planned for future

The approaches used in NYTS include over-sampling PSUs in high racial/ethnic minority strata, the use of a weighted MOS, and double class selection in large schools that contained a sufficient proportion of minority students. In the next cycle of NYTS, OSH will explore the oversampling high proportion of American Indian schools in certain select states (i.e., Arizona, Minnesota, North Carolina, Oregon, Utah, Washington, Wisconsin etc.)

6. Consider using the 2010 Census to provide the data to create the aggregate of counties used in the initial PSU selection process. The 2010 Census can be used by the NYTS to provide population counts of children in its desired age ranges (typically children under 17 years of age). Each year (within the 10-year span between collections) the 2010 Census data can be updated using Census population count projections. So, by using updated versions of the 2010 Census, each year the NYTS would be able to update their frame measures of size for the PSUs using the most current population estimate data.

Program response: Do not concur and change not made

It is better to use aggregate school enrollment in the eligible grades instead of child population in each county, and county grouping defined as PSUs. This measure should be used as a MOS for PSU selection with PPS.

The age categories in the Census breakdowns do not map well to the target population of middle school (MS) and high school (HS) students. Instead it maps to age groupings regardless of their grade in school and whether or not they are enrolled in school (nonerollment in school, e.g., dropouts, is more of an issue for HS). The relevant age groups (children) provided in the US Census data for counties, both for the Decennial Census and for the American Community Survey (ACS), are as follows:

Under 5 5-9 10-14 15-19

Using the same consistent size measure— aggregate school enrollment in the eligible grades—is important to ensure that the sampling design is nearly self-weighting, i.e., that students have the same probabilities of selection overall. Moreover, the Decennial Census data are chronically out of date, while the ACS data are only provided every 3 years in aggregate form for most counties (all but the largest counties). Finally, OSH notes that the aggregation of counties to form PSUs should not use either measure but rather a minimal number of eligible schools. The PSUs should all support the selection of sample schools.

III. RECRUITMENT

1. The use of incentives may be examined in an attempt to increase student nonresponse, particularly within African Americans. In a recent Internet-based survey conducted by the UNC Carolina Survey Research Laboratory promise of monetary incentives were highly effective in obtaining telephone and internet survey results from adolescents. Consider use of limited incentives through school giveaways of iPads. The cost is relatively low and could perhaps boost response within low income groups.

Program response: Concur in Principle but change cannot be made

Incentives are currently given to participating schools rather than individual students. The ability to adopt this recommendation is contingent upon available funding and regulatory approvals, such as Institutional Review Board (IRB) approvals.

We are also required to comply with federal guidelines regarding incentives in information collection requests. The baseline for government surveys is no incentive. We offer incentives only in particularly high burden encounters, such as those involving personal cost to the respondent e.g. when the respondent must get to the site where a focus group is being conducted (the maximum is $75), or if there is empirical evidence of response bias - and that the incentive is reducing said bias. NYTS is conducted in a school-setting that has already been approved by the relevant school authorities; the students are already there for classes regardless of the survey and as such is not considered extra burden.

2. Perhaps focus groups with administrators and separately for students could elucidate possible means of improving response rates.

Program response: Concur and change planned for future

Focus groups and other qualitative approaches, such as key informant interviews could be helpful in defining further strategies to improve response rates in NYTS. The ability to adopt this recommendation is contingent upon available funding and regulatory approvals, such as Information Collection Request (ICR) and Institutional Review Board (IRB) approvals.

It should however be noted that NYTS has a fairly high response rate at both school and student levels. School participation rates over the past eight cycles have been: 2004 (93.5); 2006 (92.0%); 2009 (93%); 2011 (83.5%); 2012 (80%); 2013 (75%); 2014 (80%), 2015 (72.6%) and 2016 (81.5%). Similarly, student response rates have been as follows: 2004 (87.5%); 2006 (87.0%); 2009 (92%); 2011 (88%); 2012 (92%); 2013 (90.5%); 2014 (91%), 2015 (87.4%) and 2016 (87.9%). Overall response rates have been: 2004 (82%); 2006 (80.0%); 2009 (85%); 2011 (73.5%); 2012 (74%); 2013 (68%); 2014 (74%), 2015 (63.4%) and 2016 (71.6%).

3. An important, low cost opportunity for NYTS is developing a professionally designed web page for NYTS that schools, teachers, parents and students could be referred to for information about the study. This should be a high priority for 2017. This needs to be done regardless of the availability of additional NYTS funding. Revisions will be necessary to all recruitment and informational materials in order to link schools, teachers, parents and students with the web site, which will contribute to the overall cost of this effort.

Program response: Concur and change in effect

The program maintains a survey website with a description of the NYTS and access to the NYTS questionnaires, methodology documentation, and the survey data for public use.

4. Utilization of YRBS-like state level contacts in recruitment may be a potential opportunity to provide improved recruitment.

Program response: Concur and change planned for future

The ability to adopt this recommendation is contingent upon available funding to the state programs to support this resource.

5. Consider developing a best practices guide (BPG) for schools to use as they ready their staff and students for NYTS data collection. The BPG goals are to obtain teacher by-in and to motivate students to do their best. The NAEP program has developed such a guide for 12th grade schools that includes videos to introduce NAEP to teachers and students, PowerPoint presentations to share at faculty and student meetings, and resources schools can customize to share information about NAEP. Also, the NAEP BPG contains successful strategies for increasing student participation (e.g., ways to recognize and thank students, assembly announcements, school newsletter information, school newspaper article, etc.).

Program response: Concur and change planned for future

The added value of BPG aimed at teacher buy-in and students' motivation for better participation in the survey could potentially increase the overall survey participation rate, and help reduce potential nonresponse bias, and planned in the next cycle of NYTS.

6. NYTS should explore shifting some or all of its field staff training (whether it be pre-survey work, actual data collection, or close out activities) to a distance learning model. The NAEP program has successfully implemented distance learning over the recent past with significant cost savings to the program. One example: converting one day of in-person field staff training into self-paced, multimedia training modules with follow-up phone conversations with supervisory field staff.

Program response: Concur and change planned for future

Although not sampling- or methodology-related, this recommendation has potential to include efficiencies and reduce costs around the training of field staff. OSH will investigate whether CDC or sister-agencies have distance-learning models or procedures that could be modeled for this purpose.

7. The NYTS should consider developing and having all field staff fill-out a session debriefing form that collects information such as attendance problems, student behavior, teacher and student reactions, adequacy of seating and space. This information can help the NYTS learn more about the logistical and qualitative factors that may impact data collection and can be used to enhance procedures for future data collections. Additionally, a school coordinator debriefing interview can augment the field staff session debriefing form.

Program response: Concur and change planned for future

In the next cycle of NYTS, a component will be added to ask all data collectors to participate in a debriefing soon after finishing data collections. The debriefing process is useful in capturing first impressions as well as things that emerged as themes, such as attendance problems, teacher and student reactions, adequacy of seating and space, and the adequacy of definitions and codes of student eligibilities.

IV. WEIGHTING

1. If possible, findings from the annual non-response bias studies done as part of NYTS should be summarized and included as part of its annual methodological report. In terms of the non-response bias analyses, it would be very useful to examine the degree to which school drop-out rates are associated with school participation rates in the NYTS.

Program response: Concur and change planned for future

The annual non-response bias analysis report assesses the response rates and potential nonresponse bias associated with NYTS. In the past, this analysis has identified some differences in participation by school type and school size, as well as by sociodemographic characteristics of student populations. This information then has been used to develop appropriate adjustments to reduce the impact of nonresponse on the final weighted data. In the past, the annual non-response bias report has been produced separately from the methodology report and used internally. Future reports will include the information from the non-response analysis in the methodology report that is published online. The methodology report will include a summary chapter of the key findings from the annual non-response bias analyses.

2. The NYTS should consider providing preliminary weights for pilot and field tests for two main reasons: 1) to be able to review testing procedures, drafting analyses, and getting an early look at general results prior to the availability of the final weights (which allow for the reporting of unbiased results); and 2) the psychometric evaluation of pilot survey items as part of the process of determining which items should be included in the final survey. The integration of a preliminary weighting process may play a role in helping NYTS achieve reporting within six months from the end of data collection.

Program response: Concur and change planned for future

In the next cycle of NYTS, OSH will implement a protocol for providing preliminary weights to conduct pilot and field tests.

3. The current weighting procedures in NYTS are appropriate. It was suggested that any change in the weighting procedure could introduce difficulties in interpreting trend data. Thus, absent any information that suggests problems with the weighting, NYTS should continue its current procedures.

Program response: Concur and change in effect

The current weighting procedures for NYTS include survey weights that are computed for each participating student to adjust for differential nonresponse and for varying probabilities of selection. Weights are post-stratified iteratively (raked) to ensure that the weighted estimates in each grade match known national population totals which are available from external data, i.e. the MDR, CCD and PSS data (Post-stratification variables include (1) school type (public vs non-public); (2) grade; (3) gender; and (4) race/ethnicity. Starting with the 2014 NYTS, a multi-layered post-stratification was used and implemented with an iterative, raking approach using marginal totals for each variable (or combination). With raking, less collapsing of categories is necessary for the post-stratification variables (e.g. all racial/ethnic categories are used rather than being collapsed into major categories). Raking also can be implemented in tandem with weight trimming which could cap the maximum weights.

The weighting procedures have worked well for the NYTS over time and substantial changes in weighting procedures at this point will complicate interpretation of trend data.
