Our state increasingly needs public lands maintenance. We believe this is because our state is facing an increase in natural and human-made disasters and does not have enough high-impact conservation efforts in place. Our theory is that if AmeriCorps members assist with high-impact conservation, disaster recovery, and mitigation projects, and reroute trails to avoid sensitive ecosystems, then public lands will become more resilient and resistant to future disasters as well as recover from past disasters. By engaging in high-impact conservation and treating various ecosystems, we will ease the burden of the disasters on our state. Ultimately, this will reduce the need for reactive public land maintenance.
