Adding Paralegals and Other Law Firm Employees

DHS is proposing to revise the subject information collection to allow an attorney or accredited representative to name a paralegal that they supervise who would be permitted to communicate with USCIS in named limited circumstances. See the form and form instructions in the documents for the specific changes being proposed.

DHS is proposing to limit the change to the form to allow for the addition of a paralegal and not extend it to any employee of the organization or firm supervised by the practitioner of record on the Notice of Entry of Appearance as Attorney or Accredited Representative. USCIS believes that the employee who is provided with the authority to communicate with USCIS on a case should have education, experience and training in regulatory compliance and professional responsibility, and understand the distinction between administrative tasks and independent legal advice. The term paralegal is not defined by law or regulated by all states or state bar associations but education and training is generally associated with being a paralegal.¹ USCIS believes that the term “paralegal” is sufficiently used and understood by the public to be an individual qualified to afford protections to affected parties who submit immigration benefit requests that exceed what would be provided by another employee.

USCIS specifically requests comments on the limitation from the practitioner community and others who may be affected on the limitation to paralegals, if that limitation should be maintained, and if not, detailed reasons why it should not.
