I don't understand why the CDC ignored its own data that showed pain patients and their doctors played only a tiny fraction in the US drug crisis? I believe the CDC just wanted the public to think they were 'doing something' about the drug crisis (which they knew is due to illegal drugs coming across the border and NOT pain patients). Does the CDC plan on taking only self-serving advice from PROP again? I've read articles recently where the CDC stated that their actions succeeded in reducing ODs. But I would like to know how they measure success when they've never counted the suicides and OD deaths they caused by forcing people in severe pain (many of them our veterans) to live without the prescribed pain medications that had safely allowed them to get through the day. The new administration will be taking over on January 20th. They must investigate how the CDC developed the unscientific and dangerous "Opioid Guidelines."
