Since medication reacts differently in every individual, why is there a one size fits all dose? I have degenerative disc disease in my upper and lower back, centralized pain disorder and both of my knees are going bad. I used to be able to care for my home, shop, clean and fix meals. But as my medication was reduced so were the things I could do for or by myself. It hurts to sleep and to be awake now and it just keeps getting worse. I cannot take nsais so my opiate medication is all that I can take to help me but even that has been reduced so much that I have not much in life that is enjoyable. I am wondering if we are all part of an evil experiment to see just how much pain we can handle. If so, I am sure there is enough data that you can stop this insanity, and return to all pain patients a decent and independent life once again.
