As a small public school administrator for 17 years I know how burdensome the biennial OCR report is for administrators to deal with during the school year. It's ridiculous to expect that these professionals take any time at all away from working with students to chase down and verify all the required data. Every minute spent doing that is a valuable minute that could be spent helping kids who desperately need it.

If I could suggest any changes, besides doing away with it, it would be to allow schools to compile the overwhelming amount of data required in the summer months. It's pretty standard federal government overreach generally speaking anyway.

Sincerely,

Jeff Cochren
