"and the number of instances of informal removals at the school level." Is this a joke? Principals are busy running a three-ring circus and you think they have the bandwidth to formally document every time they informally remove a student from the classroom? This is the kind of vague data point addition that demonstrates the utter lack of understanding that governmental education agencies have regarding education today. It's hard enough to find and hire educators willing to be principals. Adding more paperwork only makes that harder and lends to the stress and burnout that most principals experience.

Also, rather than asking understaffed districts and overworked public school employees to "prepare" for reporting 2 years from now, how about you prepare a system that can pull together all of the data we already provide at county and state levels. Why are we manually reporting the same information over, and over, and over again? All of the data is there in existing systems. Pull it yourself using the modern wonder that is computing!
