Re: Comment on Renewal of Information Collection for Endangered and Threatened Wildlife
Experimental Populations (FWS-HQ-ES-2025-1464)

Dear U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service,

The undersigned individuals write regarding the renewal of the information collection for Endangered and Threatened Wildlife Experimental Populations, including those governing the Colorado Gray Wolf nonessential experimental population programs.

We support the continuation and strengthening of this information collection effort, as thorough, transparent, and science-based reporting is essential to tracking the status of experimental populations and improving coexistence strategies. Individuals should continue to submit information about wolf interactions and related activities, and the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service should require even more detailed and comprehensive reporting to ensure that management actions are based on accurate and complete data.

However, we are deeply concerned that these information collections have been used to facilitate and track lethal control of wolves and other protected species. The reporting frameworks currently allow for "take" authorizations, including kill permits and "shoot-on-sight" orders which are measures that are incompatible with the principles of recovery and humane wildlife management.

Reintroduction programs and experimental population management should prioritize nonlethal coexistence strategies. Kill permits should not be issued under any circumstances. Proven nonlethal tools, such as range-riders, guardian animals, improved livestock husbandry, and conflict deterrents, are effective, science-supported alternatives that protect both wildlife and livelihoods without undermining public trust in recovery efforts.

We urge the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service to maintain and enhance the information collection framework, but to refocus its implementation on nonlethal coexistence and accountability. By requiring more robust data while rejecting lethal control measures, the Service can better fulfill its obligations under the Endangered Species Act and lead with transparency, responsibility, and compassion for these imperiled species.

Respectfully submitted,
