The Endanger Species Act has been abused by environmental extremists and activist judges for decades. Rather than protect specific species it has clearly been used to achieve their specific objectives at the considerable expense of the broader ecology, taxpayers, ranchers, farmers and American sportsmen. Wildlife is best managed by professional trained state agencies who have a vested interest in it's success. It is not well served by judges and activists located hundreds or thousands of miles away, who lack the knowledge or skill to make intelligent decisions.

Most apex predators simply cannot successfully coexist in the very limited wild and uncultivated western land. They need local management.
